

LIFE INTERRUPTS. THE PRODUCT REMEMBERS.

The student opportunity platform, rebuilt around the part that actually breaks: what happens between the moment you find something and the day you finally act on it.

THE PRODUCT PROBLEM

Found it Monday. Lost it by Friday.

The record survives. Everything attached to it does not.
Between one session and the next, the four things she needed in order to decide come loose from the thing they belonged to — and what is left is a title she can no longer act on.

The redesign attaches them permanently: identity in the seal, terms in one structure, the deadline on the card’s own edge, the commitment dated at the moment it is made.

WHO IT IS
Organization identity never travelled with the record.

HUMAN CONTEXT — DESIGN INPUTS

What we could verify, we used.

What we couldn't, we didn't invent.

PROVENANCE — Primary interview artifacts from the original capstone were not available to this pass; the four blocks on this page are the verifiable inputs used. No interviews, personas, quotes, or metrics were fabricated for this document.

THE SCENARIO

APPLICATIONS HAPPEN BETWEEN SHIFTS.

Monday, 08:15. End of a twelve-hour night shift. She has eleven minutes in the staff break room before she drives home to sleep. This is the entire session — and the next one will not be until Wednesday evening.

NEEDS

Placements that satisfy accreditation — right hours, right units, verified sites.

JUGGLES

Clinicals, coursework, a part-time job. Sessions are short, mobile and interrupted.

DECIDES BY

Deadline pressure and fit evidence: spots left, weekly hours, pay, distance.

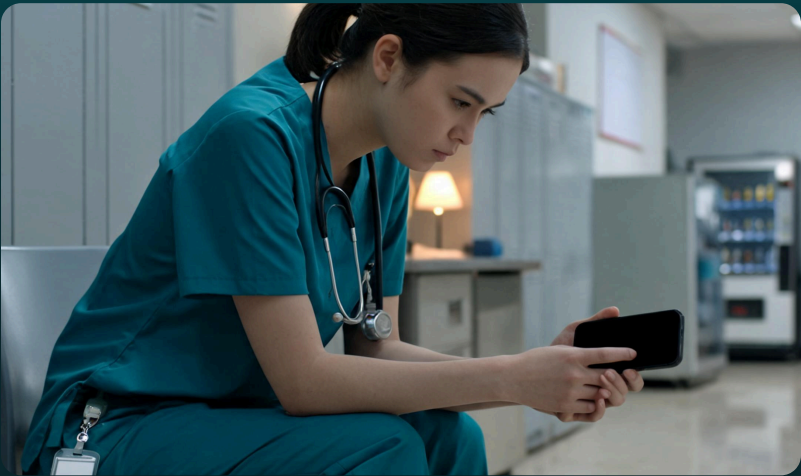

FEARS

A closing date missed, a document unsent, a saved role buried under new matches.

STRUCTURE BEFORE STYLE

Wireframes that still ship information.

Every screen began as a structural argument: what appears first, what persists, what waits. The detail screen locked five zones — identity, terms, next action, narrative, action — before a single colour was chosen.

THE SIGNATURE COMPONENT

The opportunity card.

One object has to carry an entire category of decision: who is offering this, what it asks of you, when it stops being available, and whether you already claimed it.

IT MUST CARRY

- Organization identity
- Category and type
- Role title
- Location
- Commitment and duration
- Availability
- Deadline
- Save state and its date

AND MUST NOT BECOME

A listing tile. A property card. A course thumbnail.
A ticker row. Anything whose grammar was borrowed from a market that is not this one.

WHAT THE PATH IS REPORTING

128 in view, 3 saved, 2 applied, 1 in review. Not a score and not a trend — four positions, each with a number she can act on. The resume card below it carries the organization's seal, the date she committed, and the one thing due Thursday.

There is a lot here worth exploring.

Abundance is not the problem — arrangement is. One card architecture carries every category, so a hundred matches read as one calm system instead of a hundred decisions.

Broad field. Controlled focus.

The count is the interface. Every control move re-prices the result set before the sheet closes, and the field behind stays exactly where it was — narrowing here never feels like losing.

OPPORTUNITY DETAIL + SAVE

From discovery to decision.

Facts before feelings: how long it runs, what it asks each week, what it pays, how many places are left, when it closes. Then one action — and the interface seals it, dates it, and hands it to the tracker without a modal, a toast, or a screen change.

The spine is the record.

Saved roles do not sink under new matches. They occupy a station on the same path the rest of the product uses, and each keeps the date it was claimed and the one thing it is waiting on. Removed in this pass: the momentum ring, the “rising” label, and every chart semantic.

Six verbs steer the whole feed.

A category is a filing decision. A verb is a statement about yourself. The tiles ask what pulls you, not what department you belong to — and the answer visibly re-ranks the feed, with no hidden algorithm in between.
